Dean of Faculty Retires

Dr. Armstrong pays tribute to Dean Bowker (left) as Mrs. Armstrong, John D. Bowker, '52, and President Emeritus Samuel S. Stratton observe.

Professor John G. Bowker, Dean of the Faculty, was honored at a testimonial this spring prior to his retirement in June after forty-one years service at the College.

His outstanding service to the College and warm personality were emphasized in speeches by two of the three Middlebury presidents he served under, Dr. Samuel S. Stratton, president emeritus, and Dr. James I. Armstrong. Professor Reginald L. Cook, '24, Dana professor of American Literature, speaking on behalf of the Faculty, also praised Dean Bowker following dinner at Proctor Hall.

Nearly 200 persons offered their personal best wishes to Professor and Mrs. Bowker at a reception in Proctor Lounge preceding the dinner.

A one of a kind piece of Steuben glass with an inscription on the base, covering the years he was Dean of the Faculty, was presented to the Bowkers by Dr. Grant H. Harnest, chairman of the Chemistry Department on behalf of the faculty.

Members of the committee in charge of arrangements for the testimonial included President and Mrs. Armstrong, honorary chairmen, Dr. and Mrs. Harnest, chairmen, Professor and Mrs. Cook, Dean Elizabeth Kelly, and Dr. and Mrs. Henry Prickitt.

President-Emeritus Stratton commenting on Dean Bowker's role in his administration, remarked:

"When my good friend and distinguished Professor of Classics and Dean of the Faculty, Raymond White retired I felt fortunate that Professor Bowker agreed to succeed him as Dean of the Faculty.

"Professor Bowker, I think he will not object to my referring to him as Gene, made it clear to me that his concern would be to know each member of the faculty well and to represent his problems and aspirations. In addition, he would try to interpret departmental concern to the administration. All of this he did and more with understanding and sincere involvement.

"Beyond all of this Gene was my counselor. He advised patience when I was impatient. He helped me to understand intricate happenings when I could see only black or white. What more can be said for a Dean of the Faculty at Middlebury? One thing more from me—his integrity and his devotion to Middlebury College could never be questioned by anyone at any time. I wish him happiness in his well merited retirement and can say with all who know him well that Middlebury is a better college because of his years of service."

President Armstrong in his remarks said:

"This is a moving occasion, it is also a festive and family occasion for the Faculty and for Middlebury College. I know it is also for Gene and Doris—one of those special moments which calls not for formality but informality, not for formally prepared speeches but informally prepared speeches, not the rhetorical but the intimate style.

"Above all we want to express our gratitude, our admiration, our affection, our respect; we want especially to honor Gene and Doris Bowker. We do so by gathering here tonight. The presence of all these good people—I venture to say all your friends, Gene and Doris—bears convincing witness to the aura of warm and overflowing gratitude which you two have created around you.

"You have followed the time-honored injunction 'to let your light so shine' that you have brought light into the lives of your

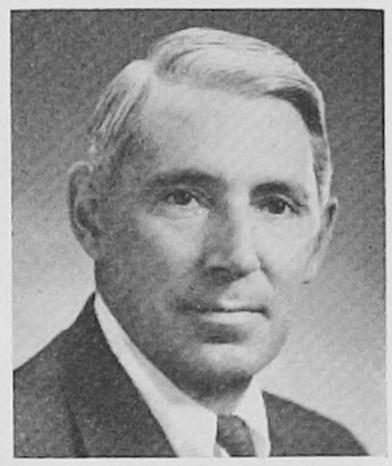
Princeton Honors President

Dr. James I. Armstrong, president of the College, was honored by his alma mater when he was awarded an honorary Doctor of Laws degree at Princeton University's 220th commencement exercises in June.



Dr. Armstrong

James F. Oates, Jr., Chairman of the Executive Committee, The Trustees of Princeton University, and University Orator, presented the ten distinguished candidates to President Robert F. Goheen, who conferred the degrees. President Goheen is a close friend of Dr. Armstrong and was one of the principal speakers at his inauguration as President of Middlebury College, four years ago.

In conferring the degree, President Goheen cited Dr. Armstrong as follows:

Warmth and genuine enthusiasm mark his personality without masking the clear mind and rocky integrity that underlie them; he hears, as it were, the music and thunder of Homer in one ear, and in the other the stern admonitions to individualism of John Calvin. Princetonian by birth, education, long experience in teaching, and through loving ties of extensive friendship, he has committed himself to advance the future of small liberal arts colleges. When, as a schoolboy, he applied for admission to this University, he wrote that he hoped here to gain 'scholarly training and broad culture.' Rarely does a man succeed so brilliantly in achieving a difficult goal.

Carpenter Lecture Established

A gift establishing the William Duncan Carpenter, '14 Memorial Lecture Fund at the College has been announced by President Armstrong. Income from the lectureship will be used to support annual lectures in economics by visiting scholars and financial leaders.

The newly endowed lecture fund was provided by the gift of Mrs. Eric Foster Storm, '16, in memory of her first husband, the late William Duncan Carpenter. Mr. Carpenter, previous to returning to Middlebury to live, was an executive with the United States Rubber Co.

An earlier gift by Mrs. Storm in memory of William Duncan Carpenter made possible the Carpenter Gate erected in 1961 at the west entrance to Old Chapel Road on the campus.

Alumni-ae Elect New Officers

The Associated Alumni of the College and the Middlebury Alumnae Association meeting during commencement weekend announced the results of the election of alumni-ae officers conducted by mail.

Frederick W. Lapham, '43, of Burlington, Vt., was elected alumni trustee for a term of five years, and Dr. Kenneth E. Cosgrove, '42, of Hendersonville, North Carolina, was elected president of the Associated Alumni. Alumnae elected Louetta Haynes Bickford '19, of Grafton, Mass., vice president, and Martha Belden Jackson, '52, Riverside, Conn., delegate-at-large.

Mr. Lapham is president of the Lapham Development Corp. of Burlington, Vt., and succeeds U.S. Representative Robert T. Stafford, '35, whose term as alumni trustee expired on June 30. Dr. Cosgrove replaces retiring president George E. Yeomans, '33. He attended the New York University Medical School and was certified a member of the American Board of Internal Medicine in 1958. Dr. Cosgrove is the author of several articles for medical journals.

Mrs. Bickford has been very active in alumnae affairs and received an alumnae plaque award last year. She follows Mary Nelson Loud, '41, as vice president. Mrs. Jackson has also been an active member of the Alumnae Association since her graduation from Middlebury.

Alumni also elected three district presidents for Washington, D.C., the Mid-West and Western Districts. Re-elected to the Western District was attorney Philip W. Hoffmire, '49, of San Rafael, California. New presidents include Julian A. Pollack, Jr., '49, of Arlington, Va., and William S. Brackett, Jr., '53, of Wilmette, Ill.

Saturday of commencement weekend was a busy day for returning alumni-ae. The day was devoted to meetings of the Alumni and Alumnae Associations, reunion luncheon at the Memorial Field House, tour of the campus, class reunion dinners and commencement play—The Birds—at Wright Memorial Theatre.

Following the luncheon alumni-ae returning for their 50th reunion were presented pins and the results of the election of alumni-ae officers announced.

Alumni service plaque awards were presented to Anthony G. L. Brackett, '33, Samuel Guarnaccia, '30, and Mrs. Gunhild Elfstrom Carlson, '27 (see page 12 for citations).

COMMENCEMENT 1967

PRESIDENT JAMES I. ARMSTRONG conferred 302 bachelor degrees, eighteen masters degrees, and five honorary degrees at commencement ceremonies ending the 167th academic year of the College.

Dr. Walt W. Rostow, special assistant to President Johnson for national security affairs, delivered the commencement address warning all Middle Eastern countries that their only viable future lay in regional economic cooperation (see page 8 for complete text).

Receiving honorary degrees were: Dr Rostow, Mrs. Laurance Rockefeller, sculptor and patroness of the arts, Dr. Thomas Johnson, educator and author, Dean Mathey, investment banker, and Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson (see page 7 for citations).

After receiving her honorary degree, the First Lady spoke briefly, saluting the graduates of Middlebury College as constructive protesters, not content merely to carry a picket sign, but eager to work toward the solution of problems.

Mrs. Johnson said she was proud to see the "noble numbers" of Middlebury graduates who go out to "all phases of public service"—the Peace Corps, VISTA, the Foreign Service and the military forces.

"You may be shocked to hear me say it, but I salute you as protesters—protesters in the very best sense of the word—against injustice and inadequacy in all forms.

"Your objection is made in the highest order by dedicated study and commitment of self to find the solution. For protest is a technique, and rings hollow as a final goal. Either for the individual or our society.

"It is easy enough to be a protester with a picket sign," she said. "All you do is show up and walk. Nobody is going to stop you. What is tough is to be a working protester."

"The effort takes thought, giving and patience," she added.

"America has been shaped by men of protests, by men of conviction. I know one of them well—my husband," Mrs. Johnson said.

"So I congratulate you on your protests, but I congratulate you even more on the good sense of your method," she said.

Mrs. Johnson said it was the habit to see the world in terms of "crises rather than continuity," without the "quiet spectacle" of men working and making progress step by step.

"We know that the picture on page one tomorrow is much more likely to show a riot than graduation," she said. "But the sound and fury must not distract us. Let us continue to be about our business."

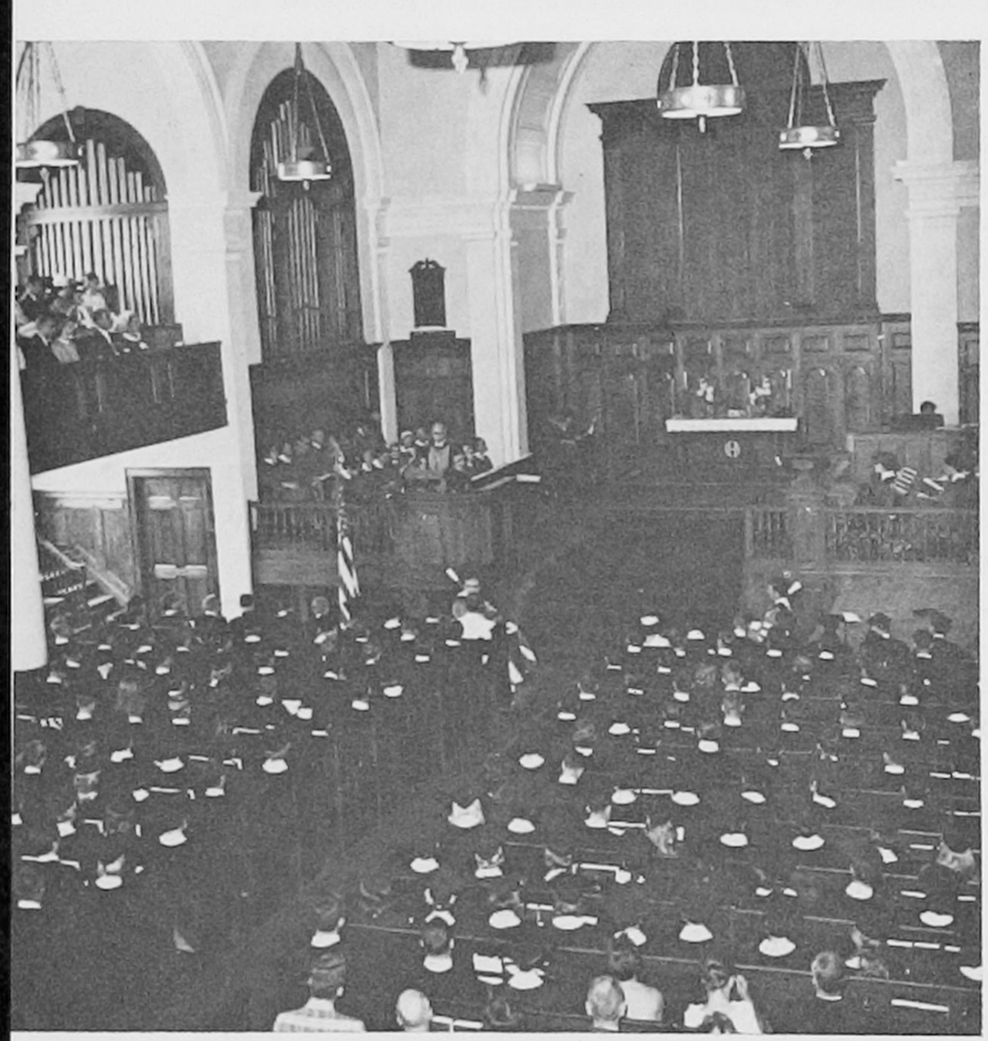
She concluded: "I believe, as I look among you, that you are already about your errand."

Commenting on Mrs. Johnson's remarks in a lead editorial the Boston Herald stated: "Good for Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson. The First Lady has spoken in defense of protest—the constructive kind. That kind deserves to be encouraged . . . Well said. Our society needs protest, for its own health. It needs people who will speak up and work against injustice. But, as Mrs. Johnson said, protest for protest's sake, protest without involvement in correcting injustice, is of little value. Actually, about all that empty protest accomplishes is to give protest a bad name. And this only makes it harder for constructive protest to overcome injustice."

The graduates of the Class of 1967 were headed by Gordon Appleby and Allison B. Beinert, valedictorians, and William H. Prescott and Mrs. Louise Collins Boutwell, saluatorians. Miss Beinert and Mrs. Boutwell graduated magna cum laude, and Mr. Appleby and Mr. Prescott, cum laude. A total of thirty-six members of the graduating class received their degrees cum laude. Forty-one men and women received department honors.

Thirty senior men were commissioned second lieutenants in the United States Army Reserve under the College's ROTC program.

Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson is congratulated by President Armstrong after receiving her honorary degree.



The baccalaureate ceremony was held in Mead Chapel on Sunday morning of commencement weekend. The address was given by President Armstrong.

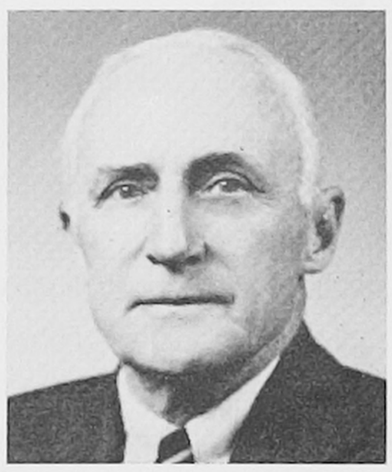
Doctor of Letters
Author, lecturer and chairman of the English Department of the Lawrenceville School

Native Vermonter, student of the Puritan tradition in parson, philosopher and poet, he upholds exacting standards of academic scholarship without loss of a compassionate humanity which has made him a celebrated teacher. With kindly guidance and erudition modestly held, he has enhanced the responsiveness of generations of young men to the ideals of a civilizing humanism. Scrupulous decipherer of Emily Dickinson's worksheet, scrap and scrawl, he has won the admiration of all who blearily encounter undergraduate calligraphy. His brilliant biography of a soul that selected her own society, challenges her somber reflection that "poets light but lamps—themselves—go out."



DEAN MATHEY
Doctor of Laws
Investment Banker

Even a year of teaching could not dissuade him from an outstanding career in investment banking. But what was lost to the academic profession has been restored by a long and devoted charter trusteeship at a great university whose recent ties to this College have not gone unnoted. An imaginative statesman in the world of national finance, an enthusiastic philanthropist in liberal education, a dedicated restorer of a colonial village, an energetic sportsman on course and court, he brings a vital spirit, a witty intelligence, and a warm humanity to all his encounters. By the engaged commitments of a lifetime he epitomizes the liberal ideal of the whole man.

MARY FRENCH ROCKEFELLER
Doctor of Laws

College trustee, Director of the Girl Scout Council, Chairman of the International Division of the Young Women's Christian Association, sculptor, patroness of the arts, she yet has time to help keep Vermont beautiful. She is honored by Middlebury College as her mother was for public spirited benevolence and continuing dedication to the enrichment of the cultural and economic opportunities of women throughout the world. She exemplifies a notable heritage of selfless service by her tireless travels in the interest of conserving human resources and natural treasures. With affectionate goodwill she encourages adventures of the open heart among the young, and with wise foresight she recognizes that majestic forest and untamed river are not a country's barrier or adversary, but an irreplaceable glory.

WALT WHITMAN ROSTOW
Doctor of Laws
Special Assistant to the President of the United States for National Security Affairs

His scholarly and public life swings on dynamic polarities. Bridging two nations in his academic career, he unites the disciplines of economics and history; in his public service he attempts to mediate between idea and action, diplomacy and power, economic progress and human liberty, national identity and global responsibility. Articulate counselor to two Presidents on national security and policy planning, he, like his poet namesake, recognizes that in a turbulent world "justice is always in jeopardy, peace walks amid hourly pitfalls." He brings stamina and skill to the rigorous tasks of questing and questioning. He labors with persistence and endurance in our common hope for a just society at home and a restoration of peace abroad.

MRS. LYNDON B. JOHNSON
Doctor of Letters
First Lady of the United States

Her energetic crusade for enhancing the beauty of America has transformed the tired ceremonies of tree planting and ribbon cutting into a dedicated national purpose to choose, not roadside stand, but timber stand; not exploitation, but exploration, of the natural beauty which is our precious birthright. Her pioneering spirit encourages a vision beyond the blight of billboards and bulldozers to a flourishing landscape and to the wonder of the Green Mountains and the Grand Canyon, the Poconos and the Pedernales. Her compassionate concern for the destitute and the deprived offers a hopeful headstart for the nation's greatest resource, all of its children. Her love eases the burden of ultimate responsibility borne by her husband. In an age on the unspoiled frontier of space her life joyously affirms what Robert Frost well knew:

"What set us on fire and what set us revolving
Lucretius the Epicurean might tell us
'Twas something we knew all about to begin with
And needn't have fared into space like his master
To find 'twas the effort, the essay of love."

nomic affairs when I was not yet out of uniform. That work initially involved such issues as reparations; the provision of food and shelter and clothing to peoples of war-devastated nations; and the revival of the German coal industry, on which the recovery of Western Europe then heavily depended. In the midst of these urgent post-war housekeeping problems, a distinguished young French diplomat—named Couve de Murville—came to Washington in November 1945, after visits to Moscow and London. He argued that, because of its importance for all of Europe, the Ruhr should be detached from Germany and separately administered. I had the privilege of sitting in on his exposition of what was then French policy. His challenging proposal stirred my mind because the question he posed was real; but, as an historian, I instinctively felt the proposed answer would not be viable. I concluded by deciding that the right answer was to bring about the economic revival of Europe on the basis of economic unity, which would make even a fully revived German economy part of a larger whole and which would provide to the small Austrian economy, about which I was also concerned, a market environment large enough for it to find a prosperous and orderly place.

And so, like all bureaucrats when sezeid with an idea, I wrote a memorandum. That bureaucratic effort has, perhaps, a very small place in the stream of American thought of that time; and happily many other bureaucrats in many other places were doing the same. But in fact, the concept of Western European unity which gradually emerged in the succeeding months and years, was the product of deep roots, powerful forces, and many men—mainly Europeans:

—The Second World War had demonstrated to many Europeans the almost suicidal danger of Europe's continuing with its traditional rivalries;
—The post-war power of the Soviet Union and the United States made many Western Europeans look towards unity as a way of acquiring a dignity which was no longer possible on the basis of traditional European statehood;
—The inevitable interconnections between the United States and Western Europe were seen as better conducted between a united Western Europe and the United States than on the basis of inherently unequal bilateral relations.

Quite aside from the economic and technological advantages of a big European market, many Europeans perceived that if Western Europe was to maintain a stature and responsibility appropriate to its tradition and capacity, unity was the right road. To the eternal credit of our country, we decided to throw our full weight behind this movement and look to a great if not always compliant partner rather than to the superficially greater influence we might have wielded in Western Europe on a divide-and-rule basis.

The first major articulation of our support for Western European economic unity was in Secretary of State George Marshall's speech at a graduation ceremony in another New England college just a few days more than 20 years ago.

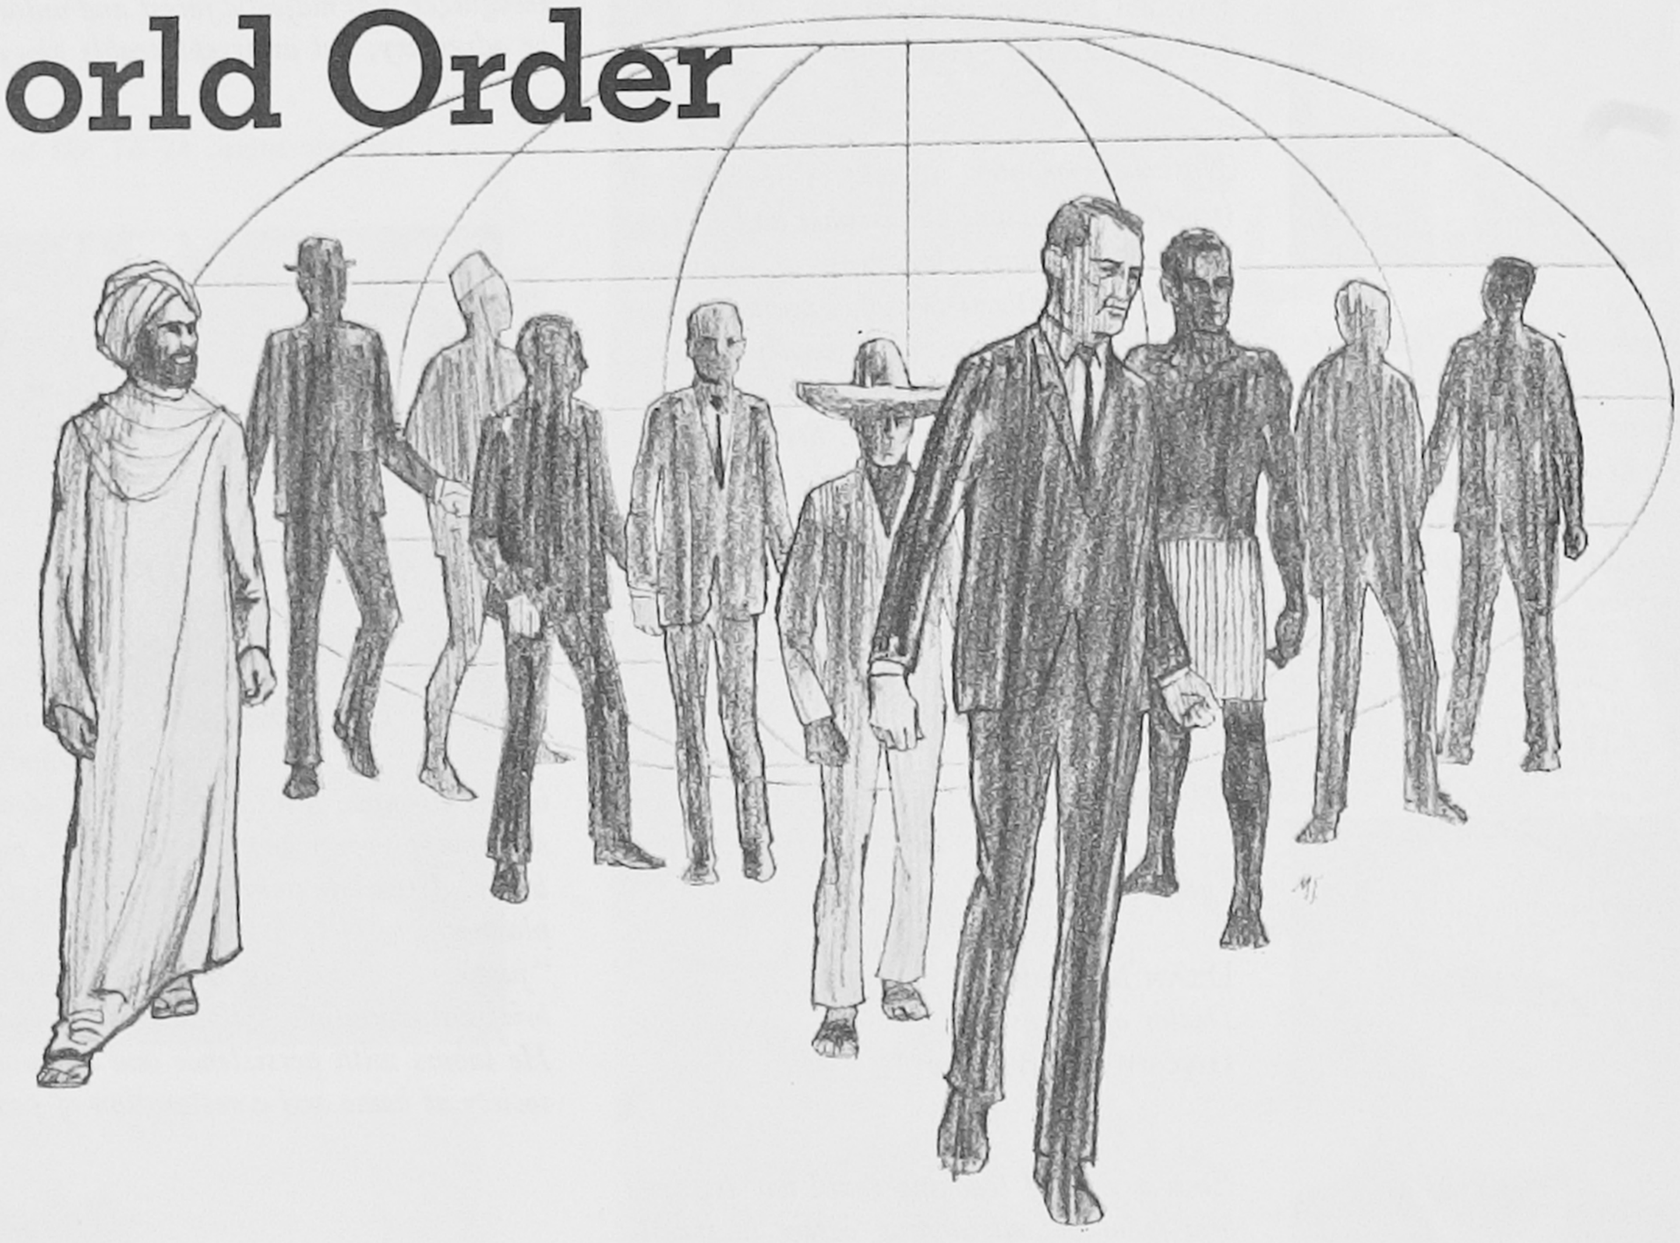
Since that time the movement towards Western European unity has by no means been smooth or easy. The process is evidently incomplete.

Nevertheless, it moves forward; and I believe it will continue to move forward as the logic of European interest and the character of the world environment in which Europe must live presses in this direction.

IN THE LAST FEW YEARS we have seen essentially this same logic beginning to take hold in the developing parts of the world. If I were addressing you in 1961, for example, I might have talked about our support for Western European unity and the Atlantic partnership, and then refer to the common responsibilities of the Atlantic community for the nations and peoples of Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America. And, at that time, representatives of those nations and regions tended to think in terms of the common interests of developing nations. But quietly, slowly, almost imperceptibly, there has been a change.

It is, I believe, one of the most important, if unnoticed, transitions in policy under President John-

Regionalism and World Order



By Walt Whitman Rostow

I am reliably told by officials of Middlebury College that the average age of this graduating class is 21½ years. You have lived your lives, then, since 1945—in the time since the end of the Second World War.

Those years have been dominated in the headlines—and in our minds—by a series of crises; by wars and the danger of war. And, indeed, at the present time, our men are fighting side by side with soldiers of six other nations in Southeast Asia. We are only now, hopefully, emerging from a brief but violent conflict in the Middle East.

In a world of clashing ideologies, of nuclear weapons, of rapid decolonization, and of profound revolutionary ferment in all the southern continents, we have not been able in the first post-war generation to achieve a true peace. Our achievement has been limited—but nevertheless real: we have thus far avoided major war, as well as major changes in the status quo by the use of external force. We have maintained the minimum condition for world order; but that goal still lies ahead.

Today I thought I would talk to you not about war and crises, but about one constructive strand in our nation's policy and experience which has, on the whole, been quietly successful and which is contributing to the slow emergence of peace and order on the world scene. It lies in a series of regional endeavors.

The concept of regionalism began for me when I was a junior officer in the State Department where I was put to work on German-Austrian eco-with others—can establish this foundation for the future of Asia.

Since McGeorge Bundy and Bill D. Moyers left the White House, Dr. Rostow, a former professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been emerging as the White House spokesman on foreign affairs. According to The New York Times, "this is widely regarded as an appropriate role, for Dr. Rostow is probably the most loqacious American official since Walt Whitman himself worked in the Interior Department more than 100 years ago."

But they are looking not to us but primarily to themselves to define their future and to build it.

Literally for the first time in history the governments and peoples of Asia are coming together in a spirit of cooperation to begin to map the future of the region.

The list of Asian meetings that have occurred in the past two years is too long to repeat here. But they have met in various groupings among themselves—without us—to consider regional programs in the fields of education, agriculture, banking, and transportation. In addition, the Mekong Committee, working on the very edge of the battlefields, is carrying forward with a new vitality; and the Asian Development Bank is in operation in Manila, led by a distinguished Japanese.

In the proportions of its initial capital stock, that Bank foreshadows the kind of cooperation that may be possible in the future: we have put in 20%; the Japanese, 20%; the other Asian nations 40%; and the balance comes from many sources outside the region.

This surge of cooperative effort in the New Asia takes place against the background of remarkable momentum in South Korea; Taiwan, Thailand, Malaysia, as well as Japan; while Indonesia moves at last to find its feet after years of stagnation or worse.

On April 23, the New York Sunday Times ran a story from Bangkok by Drew Middleton discussing the mood of the New Asia and the reasons for Asian support for our Viet Nam policy. It contained this observation by an Asian Foreign Minister, which I have heard, in different forms, from Seoul to Kuala Lumpur, from Tokyo to Bangkok: "For youth, anticolonialism is part of history and Communism has split and lost its appeal in the process. Perhaps regionalism with its promise of stability and economic progress will be youth's big concept for the future."

THE ONE REGION in the non-Communist world where regional institutions and spirit have not yet begun to emerge is, of course, the Middle East. During the whole post-war generation, that region has been bedeviled by multiple splits and quarrels: not only between the Arab states and Israel, but also by divisions among the Arab states and between certain Arab and other Moslem states.

No one from outside a region can create a spirit of determination to face and solve problems by regional cooperation. No one outside a region can build regional institutions. But we would hope that out of the frustrations and tragedies of post-war Middle Eastern history we might see emerge a new desire to achieve dignity and stability for all through regional cooperation.

I am sure we and others outside the region will be prepared to be helpful if the peoples and governments of that area themselves decide that this is the right road—and begin to move in their own ways along the path already taken by Western Europe, Latin America, and Asia.

AS WE LOOK FROM THE PAST to the future, this spreading regional impulse has a particular meaning for our country, its policy and our position on the world scene. Speaking at Lancaster, Ohio, on September 5, 1966, President Johnson said:

> "Our purpose in promoting a world of regional partnerships is not without self-interest. For as they grow in strength inside a strong United Nations, we can look forward to a decline in the burden that America has had to bear this generation."

We are finding, then, in regionalism, a new relationship to the world community somewhere between the overwhelming responsibility we assumed in the early post-war years—as we moved in to fill vacuums of power, and to deal with war devastation—and a return to isolationism. From the beginning our objective was not to build an empire of satellites, but to strengthen nations and regions so that they could become partners.

To fulfill this vision will take time and patience. Above all, it will take dogged, stubborn pride and effort by the peoples of the various regions of the world. Moreover, many problems can only be solved on a global, rather than a regional, basis.

But in the great federal task we all assumed in 1945 with the acceptance of the United Nations Charter, we have learned that regionalism has a large and hopeful place.

The record of regional architecture in the first post-war generation is on the whole good and promising; but it is evidently incomplete.

As you take stock of the tasks ahead—in your coming time of responsibility—I am sure the development of regionalism will engage your generation as much as it has mine.

son—and transitions of thought in the world community—that we are now actively supporting the building of regional institutions and regional cooperation, in Latin America, Asia, and Africa, as well as in Europe. And we are doing this because, despite the continuing power of nationalism, men and governments in those regions are becoming seized with the same kind of thoughts that gripped Western Europe in the late 1940's and early 1950's.

FOR EXAMPLE, between the Punta del Este Conference of 1961 and the meeting of Presidents in Punta del Este in 1967, the greatest change—aside from an increase in confidence in Latin America's destiny under freedom—was the rise in emphasis on the movement towards Latin American economic integration.

I have had in recent years the great privilege of working with Latin Americans as closely as I was permitted to work with Western Europeans in the immediate post-war years. I have found emerging in Latin America underlying forces and thoughts quite similar to those which moved Europeans a generation earlier. Latin Americans understand the technical advantages of economic integration; they understand that they can solve more problems for themselves and acquire a position of greater strength and dignity on the world scene through economic integration; and they understand that they will be able to work as a strong partner to the United States only if they move in this direction.

As in Western Europe, the economic integration movement in Latin America is drawing to it the best and proudest minds and spirits in that continent.

IN AFRICA, of course, the movement towards economic unity and cooperation is much less well developed. The nations of the region are at an earlier stage of development. Indeed, in some cases the nations born out of colonialism have not been able to maintain their initial unity against the pull of tribal and regional differences. Nevertheless, in counterpoint, there are the first beginnings of regional spirit and organization: the Organization for African Unity; the Economic Commission for Africa; and the African Development Bank.

In the first speech ever given by an American President wholly devoted to Africa, President Johnson, on May 26, 1966, threw our weight behind African regionalism.

"We have been particularly heartened by the impetus toward regional cooperation in Africa.

"The world has now reached a stage where some of the most effective means of economic growth can best be achieved in large units commanding large resources and large markets. Most nation-states are too small, when acting alone, to assure the welfare of all of their people. . . .

> "Above all, we wish to respond in ways that will be guided by the vision of Africa herself, so that the principles we share and the principles which underlie the OAU Charter come to life in conformity with the culture and aspirations of the African peoples."

One simply cannot build first-rate universities and technical schools or bring in modern telecommunications on the basis of states as small as many of the African countries. There is, therefore, wisdom, in trying even now to develop regional and sub-regional approaches to African problems. But, as in Western Europe and Latin America, the path will be long, uneven, and frustrating.

THE MOST DRAMATIC EMERGENCE of a new regional spirit and policy is, of course, in Asia.

In a speech at Johns Hopkins University on April 7, 1965, President Johnson said: "There must be a much more massive effort to improve the life of man" in Asia; and he went on to observe that the "first step is for the countries of Southeast Asia to associate themselves in a greatly expanded cooperative effort for development."

In the 26 months since the President spoke, we have seen in Asia a quite remarkable transformation of attitudes and action.

While the war in Viet Nam goes on, with all its suffering, the peoples of Asia have begun to define for themselves a new future. That future hinges on a conviction that we are serious about seeing it through in Viet Nam. Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore has, on a number of occasions, spoken in the vein in which he was recently quoted in The Reporter magazine. He asked of Americans: "Are your people really serious in Vietnam? If you are, we are with you." They are with us because they know that the failure of aggression from Hanoi against South Viet Nam and Laos is essential to the security of the region; and only the American commitment—along

Professor Reginald L. Cook, '24 has been named by President Armstrong the first Charles A. Dana Professor at Middlebury. These new distinguished professorships are supported by a $250,000 matching grant from the Charles A. Dana Foundation. Under the Foundation plan, the College is one of ten select Eastern private colleges and universities chosen to receive four professorships, which are designed to provide sufficient salaries for attracting and holding highly qualified members at these institutions.

Professor Cook—Julian W. Abernethy Professor of American Literature—has taught at Middlebury for thirty-eight years. He has been chairman of the American Literature Department, and from 1946 to 1964 was director of the College's Bread Loaf School of English.

A Rhodes Scholar, he is the author of several books including Passage To Walden, a study of Thoreau; The Dimensions of Robert Frost; The Concord Saunterer; and Selected Prose and Poetry of Ralph Waldo Emerson. He has presented papers at meetings of the American Studies Association, the Thoreau Centennial, and the Northern New York Teachers Association.

Five senior faculty members have been named to newly established Old Dominion Professorships, President Armstrong announced this spring. They are: Dr. Paul M. Cubeta, professor of English and Dean of the Faculty; Dr. Howard M. Munford, '34, professor of American Literature; Dr. Henry B. Prickitt, professor of English; Dr. David K. Smith, '42, Alumni Professor of Economics; and Dr. Pardon E. Tillinghast, professor of History.

Support of these professorships will come from a $50,000 Old Dominion Foundation grant, received by the College last fall. Funds provided are to be expended over a five-year period to help raise the salary level of outstanding full professors and help in the attraction of competent teacher-scholars for new appointments at the full professor level.

Summer research grants have been awarded by the College to eleven members of the faculty for work in the preparation of books or articles for publication, according to President Armstrong.

There are three recipients each in the History and English Departments and one each in the Departments of Spanish, Geology, Economics, Fine Arts and Athletics. Faculty members receiving grants include:

HISTORY—Dr. Pardon Tillinghast, department chairman, Dr. Marjorie Lamberti, assistant professor, and Dr. Arthur Knoll, assistant professor; ENGLISH—Dr. Paul Cubeta, professor and director of the Bread Loaf School of English, Dr. David Littlefield, associate professor, and Dr. Robert Hill, Jr., assistant professor; ECONOMICS—Dr. David Smith, '42, professor and department chairman; GEOLOGY—Dr. Brewster Baldwin, associate professor; FINE ARTS—Dr. Robert Reiff, associate professor; SPANISH—Dr. Rafael Osuna, assistant professor; ATHLETICS—Joseph J. Morrone, Jr., soccer and lacrosse coach and assistant professor.

Dr. Tillinghast will use his grant to study a collection of mediaeval manuscripts at Collegeville, Minn., in connection with a book he is writing on a 15th century German cardinal, Nicholas of Cusa.

Miss Lamberti will work at Wienar Library, London, England, doing research on the German jury during the Wilhelmian Era.

Dr. Knoll will study documents at Stanford University Library relating to the colony of Togo under the rule of Imperial Germany. He wrote a related article for publication last year on "Administration of Taxation in the Gold Coast Colony and in Togo."

Dr. Cubeta will use his grant in New York City in connection with the preparation of the text of his new book, "A 20th Century Interpretation of Shakespeare's Richard II."

Dr. Littlefield will use his grant to complete a critical study and prepare for publication a book on Aristophanes' comedy, "Frogs."

Dr. Hill will work this summer at Widener Library, Cambridge, Mass., in connection with a Tennyson anthology he is editing.

Dr. Smith plans to spend part of the summer in Washington, D.C., studying documents of government agencies concerned with public utility integration and re-organization in New England.

Work on two articles in the field of art for professional publications is planned this summer by Dr. Reiff. He is the author of several book reviews and articles.

Dr. Baldwin will attend the National Science Foundation Field Institute, held this summer in the Canadian Rockies, to do field research work.

Dr. Osuna will use research material, obtained in Madrid, Spain last year, in connection with his research on "Persiles of Cervantes."

Coach Morrone plans to tour Scandinavia, France and Germany with an American soccer team of high school and college youths to observe methods of play and coaching in these countries. He plans to combine material obtained on this trip with that gathered last year in Poland, into a book on soccer fundamentals.

Dr. David J. Littlefield, associate professor of English, has been appointed chairman of the Division of Humanities by President Armstrong. He succeeds Dr. Paul M. Cubeta, who became Dean of the Faculty upon the retirement of Dean John G. Bowker on June 30.

Dr. Littlefield

A member of the Middlebury faculty for the past thirteen years, Dr. Littlefield will head the Division of Humanities which is one of the five major divisions in the College and includes the Departments of American Literature, English-Drama-Speech, Fine Arts, Music, Philosophy and Religion. He received his Ph.D. degree from Yale.

Dr. Littlefield is a specialist in the Classics and is presently working on a book on Aristophanes' comedy, "Frogs." He spent 1965–66 on sabbatical leave at Princeton where he did research for his book. He has written several articles for publication and lectured at other colleges and universities.

Dr. Frederick C. Cabot, assistant professor of English, has been named assistant director of the College's Bread Loaf School of English, effective September 1. In his new position, Dr. Cabot will aid Dr. Cubeta, director of the school, in planning for the 1968 session.

1967 Alumni Plaque Awards

Anthony G. L. Brackett, '33 —". . . A native of Westbrook, Maine, you matriculated at Middlebury College, received your B. S. degree in 1933, your Masters of Education from Harvard in 1942 and your Doctorate from Harvard in 1955.

"You have served in the field of education as a teacher, principal, superintendent and consultant since 1934 in Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Connecticut. Your talents have been recognized by many as you serve as a member of the Connecticut Education Association, National Education Association, American Association of School Administrators, Association of Public School Superintendents, Phi Delta Kappa, Co-author of Publications of New England School Development Council and a three-year term as member of the Executive Committee of the New England School Development Council. You are now Director of Project SPRED in Fairfield County, helping to bring excellent education to each district in southern Fairfield County.

"Somehow, you have still found time to serve your college as you were President of the Boston District Alumni 1958–60, Class Fund Chairman for many years and a valuable member of the Alumni Council. In 1961 you were elected an Alumni Trustee and for five years you served in this position.

"Your career has been a distinguished one and today we honor you for the outstanding work you have done in the field of education and in Alumni affairs for Middlebury."

Samuel Guarnaccia, '30—"A distinguished member of your class, you have dedicated your life to education and for the past twenty-seven years, to education at Middlebury.

"As an undergraduate, you were an outstanding football player and over the years you have continued your interest in this sport by coaching freshman football, helping coach varsity football and acting as a scout for Duke Nelson. You have also served Middlebury as Acting Director of Admissions and Acting Alumni Secretary, but your greatest contribution has been in the classroom.

"You have distinguished yourself as a teacher in the fields of Spanish and Italian, the departments which you now chair at Middlebury. You are known not only to Middlebury undergraduates and alumni, but also to the thousands of people who have attended the Spanish Summer School, which you serve as Dean and the Middlebury Graduate School of Spanish in Spain which you directed in 1952–53, 1957–58, 1962–63 and which you will direct next year.

"Your talents are widely known and President Kennedy urged you to join the Peace Corps in 1964 as Director of the Peace Corps in Peru. You accepted this call from the President of our country and for 15 months, you supervised one of the largest Peace Corps Programs in the world.

"We honor you in recognition of your distinguished career and your enviable record of service to education in general and Middlebury in particular. You are an inspiration to the young people who have you in class and to your colleagues on the faculty and staff at Middlebury."

Gunhild Elfstrom Carlson, '27 —". . . September 1923 was a good month for Middlebury College because Gunhild Elfstrom, now Mrs. Eric B. Carlson, entered as a freshman from Worcester, Massachusetts, that hotbed of Middlebury loyalists! Since her graduation in 1927, her loyalty to the college and the Alumnae Association has never flagged. As a leader in the old Albany district, as Association president, as chairman or member of several standing committees, and finally as Delegate-at-Large, when she organized the Cape Cod Club, she has served brilliantly and faithfully, remaining ever modest. The communities in which she has lived have also profited from her ability and her willingness to serve. Active in the American Association of University Women, she helped organize the Cape Cod Branch and served as its president for four years. She has worked with Girl Scouts and held offices in professional organizations. A dedicated teacher, she has surely enriched the lives of thousands of students."

Russian language and literature to his students, many of whom have gone on to distinguished teaching careers of their own. . . ."

JOHN GENE BOWKER: "For forty-one years—1926 to 1967—John G. Bowker has served the Middlebury College community with real devotion. His allegiance to the College extends over approximately one-quarter of its institutional history; a period during which he justly earned many distinctions while serving under three presidents—Dr. Paul D. Moody, Dr. Samuel S. Stratton, and Dr. James I. Armstrong. The number and qualities of his distinctions are impressive. He has been an able and enthusiastic teacher of mathematics for four decades, a lively and responsible department chairman for thirteen years, a vigorous and diplomatic chairman of the Science Division for twelve years and, not least, an exemplary Dean of the Faculty for the last fourteen years. At our final faculty meeting for 1967 we pause in our deliberations to acknowledge with gratefulness the effective performance which he has demonstrated in the exacting office of Dean of the Faculty.

"Warm and approachable, outgoing and congenial, he has been a kindly and gracious leader. He has rejoiced with us in our moments of glory and shown himself to be both a forbearing witness and a good-humored champion during our hours of ordeal. No faculty member who has sought his counsel in-or-out of the line of duty has failed to secure cheerful, patient, and sympathetic guidance. Dean Bowker's gentleness has helped relax our personal tensions, and the wisdom of his experience has enabled us in times of trial to resolve stubborn problems.

"Because his relationship to us has always been direct and honest, his exercise of the office of the Dean of the Faculty has never been vitiated by deviousness. Nor has its exercise reflected any arrogance of power. The ground Dean Bowker and his colleagues have met on—that of a sustaining pride and dignity in a common profession—has been democratic. Indeed, he is one of the Melvilleian "kingly commons" and as such we respect and honor him. As our representative in the intimate councils of this college, and as our administrative intercessor, he has earned and shared our confidence.

"Now, as he relinquishes a position of mutual trust and obligation, we are intensely aware that a man of good will has served us well. Therefore, it is important in this formal minute to extend to him more than our considered respect and gratefulness for multiple tasks courageously accepted, thoughtfully deliberated, and devotedly performed. We want particularly to extend to Dean and Mrs. Bowker our continuing affection and our warmest wishes for all the years ahead."

colleagues—and the miracle is that there has been so much light and so little heat!

"You will permit me a few words about the Dean of the Faculty from the perspective of the President.

"How does one handle administratively the problem of an irresistible faculty force meeting an immovable objection? Answer: you ask Gene Bowker.

How can one be sure the faculty will be represented objectively and dispassionately with unabashed bias for the interests of the faculty? Answer: you ask Gene Bowker.

How does one see to it that the humanity which must authenticate a college is tended and nourished where it counts so importantly—among the faculty? Answer: you depend on Gene Bowker.

How does Gene do it? I suspect in some very large measure because he has Doris with him—twin stars in the life of the College for 41 years. We have been truly blessed.

Item: Armstrong, May 1967

"Gene, I said, I've made a serious mistake—He smiled and said that's good—only one mistake in a ball game—you're batting average is mighty good."

Item: Armstrong's note 19 May 1964

I asked Gene to suspend his request for relief, and he did so with good grace so characteristic of him.

Item: Bowker letter, 11 August 1953

"Before the opening of College I will move from Munroe 204 to Old Chapel 49."

Item: Bowker letter, 10 September 1943

"Mr. Ballou and I are leaving tonight for the Mathematical Association meeting at Rutgers tomorrow and Sunday. We shall be back for our appointments on Monday morning."

Item: Bowker letter, November 1938 (Queensborough Court Hotel)

"We placed John in a small parochial school nearby where he seems to be fitting in very well.

During the crisis we were fitted to gas masks and strongly advised by the American Consulate to make plans to go home."

Item: December 14, 1936

"I have your note of the 10th before me.

Will the budget of the Math Department stand this expense? If so, and Mr. Perkins approves, you have my approval.

Cordially yours,
President Moody"

Let me close these brief remarks with a poem of John Donne translated out of Gazaeus, Vota amico facta—a prayer which seems to me largely answered.

God grant thee thine own wish, and grant thee mine,
Thou, who dost, best friend, in best things outshine;
May thy soul, ever chearfull, nere know cares,
Nor thy life, ever lively, know gray haires.

Nor thy tongue, ever true, know a false thing,
Nor thy word, ever mild, know quarrelling.
Nor thy works, ever equall, know disguise,
Nor thy fame, ever pure, know contumelies.
Nor thy prayers, know low objects, still Divine;
God grant thee thine own wish, and grant thee mine.

Retiring Faculty

TWO PROFESSORS whose service to the College total sixty-five years, closed out their active teaching careers at Middlebury on June 30. Their retirement deprives the College of two men distinguished for teaching, scholarship and lasting contributions to the Middlebury community. They are Professor John G. Bowker, Dean of the Faculty and Baldwin Professor of Mathematics, and Dr. Mischa H. Fayer, Professor of Russian and Director of the College's Russian Summer School.

At the final faculty meeting of the academic year, the following tributes to Dean Bowker and Dr. Fayer were read into the minutes of the meeting.

MISCHA HARRY FAYER: "On this occasion we are mindful of the twenty-four years of distinguished service of Mischa Harry Fayer. After receiving his primary, secondary and part of his college education in Russia, Mischa attended the University of Minnesota where he received his A.B. degree in 1926 and his M.A. degree in 1928. Continuing his interest in French, Mischa continued graduate work at the Sorbonne, University of Southern California and Claremont College before completing work for his Ph.D. at Columbia University in 1945.

"His distinguished teaching career commenced in 1929 at State Teachers College, Dickinson, North Dakota, where he served as Chairman of the Department of Foreign Languages for ten years and later as Chairman of the Division of Languages and Literature for three years. Following a year as Instructor in Russian at Michigan State College, Mischa came to Middlebury in 1943 as Assistant Professor of Russian.

"Founder of the Russian Summer School in 1945, Mischa has brought to the School and himself national recognition for its quality and his energetic leadership. In 1958, he initiated the Institute of Soviet Studies to prepare American students for diplomatic, scientific and teaching careers. The author of Gide, Freedom and Dostoevsky (1946), Basic Russian, Vol. I (1959) and Vol. II (1960) and Simplified Russian Grammar, his pioneer texts are taught throughout the nation. Mischa is a member of the Modern Language Association, the A.A.U.P. and the American Association of Teachers of Slavic and Eastern European Languages where he served as Secretary for several years.

"But Mischa will best be remembered as a teacher—a teacher dedicated to transferring his love of Class rivalry was part of college life in those days and it exhibited itself in the harmless ritual of the cane rush. It was the custom for the freshmen to enter morning chapel with a cane and to challenge the sophomores to take it away from them. The sophomores always obliged and the resulting free-for-all was enjoyed immensely by the on-looking upperclassmen and Faculty. In the interest of decorum President Hulbert had warned the classes to cease the rushes weeks earlier in the term. But class rivalry brushed aside prudence and on Tuesday, the 11th of November, morning chapel was marked by a noisy cane rush. Wednesday chapel was a repeat performance of Tuesday. On Thursday Middlebury discipline prevailed when the Faculty served notice that each sophomore would receive twenty-four demerits and each freshman sixteen. Clarence Leavenworth also received a notice of suspension.

The students reacted boldly and quickly to the Faculty edict. And they reacted, it might be added, without the benefit of a student government. The sophomores rallied to the cause of Leavenworth, one of their most popular classmates. They were not going to see him suspended on the basis of such trivial offenses. Thursday noon the class met and resolved to place themselves in voluntary suspension until Leavenworth's demerits were reduced. They also picked four of their most able men to negotiate with the Faculty.

The freshman class, angered by the excessive demerits levied upon them, met the same Thursday afternoon and decided "to absent themselves from all college duties until justice had been done." Four men were selected to ask the Faculty to reduce the demerits.

After an unproductive meeting with the sophomores Friday morning, the Faculty suspended the entire class. Friday night the seniors convened and, in support of the other classes, declared they would "absent themselves from all college exercises until satisfaction had been obtained." The junior class followed the lead of the other three Saturday morning in refusing to attend any classes. Thus, reported the Addison County Journal, "the last class and the last scholar in the college left, leaving the Faculty alone in their glory."

Saturday afternoon the classes united in a mass meeting at which they chose a committee of eight, two from each class, to meet with the Faculty. On the other hand, the Faculty ordered each sophomore home, to return to Middlebury within a week with an apology or face dishonorable suspension. As for the other classes, they were to attend Monday's recitations or be suspended.

Sunday the four classes held another mass meeting in the chapel and resolved to remain perfectly respectful, not to occupy the accustomed seating in church that morning, and not to go home. When no one showed up for classes Monday morning, the Faculty suspended the entire school.

Meanwhile, Middlebury's troubles were attracting the interest of the metropolitan newspapers, who payed for long reports by telegraph. The New York Tribune called the revolt "a childish piece of business," while the New York Sun commented, "these arbitrary interferences with innocent college and school sports are almost always a mistake." The New York World asked, "Has stalwartism infected the Faculty of Middlebury College in Vermont? Every member of every class is in revolt and the shot and shell of universal expulsion impend."

The revolt created dilemmas for several students. One, Ed Parker, a junior, who had a father on the Faculty, decided to side with his class. He told his mother, "I don't like to be the only one there."

Tuesday John Stewart, '46, ex-governor of Vermont and College Trustee, arrived from New York City to act as a mediator. He met with both camps separately in the hope of ending the fracas. No agreement was reached, however. On Wednesday one student, C. D. Pillsbury, defected to the enemy camp. His uncle, on the Faculty, no doubt pressured him into it, but Pillsbury's capitulation was not forgiven by the students. Thursday the committee of eight students and the Faculty met once again and terms for ending the revolt were established and announced by President Hulbert on Friday.

First, no student would receive demerits for absences of the past week. Second, the Faculty agreed to accept petitions asking for demerit reductions and give them candid consideration. Finally, no apologies would be asked of students for their part in the revolt.

The next day the revolt was over as a majority of the students signed a pledge that read, "I wish to hereby express my willingness to submit to all future college requirements." By Monday morning the remaining students had signed the pledge and classes resumed.

The December 5, 1879, issue of The Middlebury Register, the town's second newspaper, carried reprints of editorials expressing opinion on the outcome of the revolt. The Burlington Free Press and Times complained, "Are not the young conquerors of Middlebury exacting pretty severe terms of their late superiors in authority?" The Register suggested to the editor of the Free Press and Times, a trustee of U.V.M., that he mind his own business and turn his attention to the corrupt appropriations of the University's Agricultural Fund.

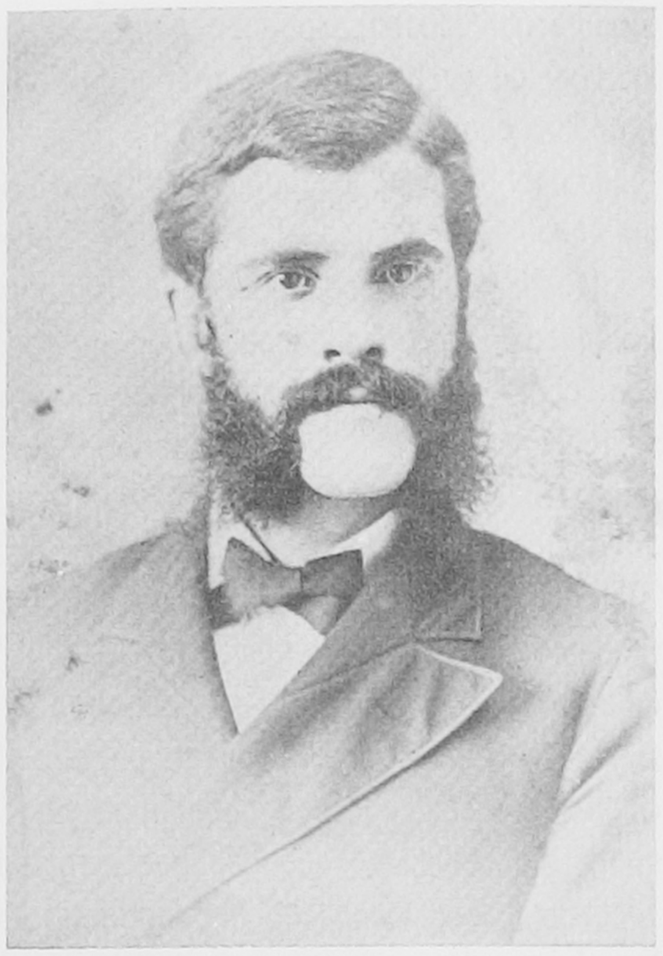
The New York Herald advised Middlebury College to convert to an academy and to relinquish the right to grant degrees. Answered the Register, "Middlebury had better wiggle along as it is."

Neither the faculty nor the students really won and no changes were made in the institutional structure of the college. Sophomore Leavenworth and President Hulbert, the two key figures of the incident, did not emerge from the revolt unscathed. Leavenworth cooled his heels at home for a few weeks before returning. An investigating committee was established by the Trustees shortly after the revolt "to remedy untoward conditions," according to Dr. Ezra Brainerd, president of Middlebury from 1886 to 1908. As a result, President Hulbert and three professors resigned after the spring term. A note in the Middlebury Register reported that Dr. Hulbert planned "to accept a position in a literary institution in New Jersey at a salary of $3,000."

This comment by the Albany Journal probably sums up best the great effect of the revolt: "Whatever the merits and result of the case, it is certainly giving Middlebury a first-class advertisement. Up to this time many persons were unaware that such a college existed."

The Student Revolt of 1879

by Peter Deyoe, '69



Clarence G. Leavenworth, '88
Responsible for the Student Revolt of 1879

It is almost inevitable that an educational institution, like a human being, undergo a number of traumatic experiences in its early years. An examination of Middlebury's early history reveals crises that at the time appeared to threaten the existence of the institution. The religious revivals of 1805, 1809, and 1836 nearly decimated the ranks of both students and professors, who, seized with religious fervor, left the college in order to find their true calling in life. In 1847 Middlebury faced extinction with a faculty of two, almost no endowment, and heavy mortgages on all college buildings.

Yet the most unsettling and dramatic crisis ever experienced by Middlebury took place in November, 1879, when the students revolted en masse and made Middlebury, for one week, a college without a student. Newspapers in Boston and New York covered the revolt with front page stories and editorials. The Addison County Journal called the revolt "the most serious misunderstanding which ever arose in an American college." For a time staid Middlebury was, in fact, where the action was; and today Middlebury students can find at least some satisfaction in having beaten Berkeley to the draw by eighty-eight years.

If you were a student at Middlebury in September of 1879, you most likely got there on horseback. You lived either in Starr or Painter or you rented "rooms" at a boarding house in Middlebury. You could eat college food, dine at an eating club, or take meals with a family in town. $198 took care of the principal expenses of the year. Tuition cost only $45 for the three fall, winter, and spring terms.

Before you were admitted you had to take proficiency exams in Latin and Greek grammar, ancient and modern geography, and arithmetic, which included knowledge of quadratic equations. Once in, you and fifty-four undergraduates studied a curriculum based on the belief that the study of antiquity was the best training for gentlemen and scholars. A faculty of eight taught you from three to eight mandatory courses each term; electives had not yet made an appearance at Middlebury. Courses such as Etymology of the Greek Verb, Xenophon's Memorabilia, and Evidences of Christianity were typical.

You had to attend daily chapel and a service in a Middlebury church on Sunday. If you had read carefully your catalogue for 1879-1880 you knew that "demerits for absences and other irregularities are made the basis of discipline." Finally, you soon found out that discipline was taken most seriously by the Faculty and especially so by Calvin B. Hulbert, Doctor of Divinity, and President of Middlebury College.

Clarence G. Leavenworth's sophomore slump began on the first day of classes that September. He had arrived in Middlebury late the night before after a bumpy all-day ride from his home in Proctor, thirty miles east of Middlebury. This fact, however, did not prevent his Latin professor from awarding him four demerits for coming to recitation without a book and unable to recite. Leavenworth encountered Middlebury discipline again several weeks later when he and three companions were singing their way up the steps of Painter Hall after a night on the town. An irritated resident came out and informed Leavenworth that he had just collected four more demerits.

Now Clarence Leavenworth happened to be an avid football fan who took part in a game whenever he had the chance. President Hulbert was not partial to football, however, and when he caught Leavenworth kicking a football near the college buildings, he issued Leavenworth the grand sum of twenty more demerits, leaving him a margin of twenty-two more demerits to receive before he was liable to suspension.

Life has no direct sense whatever for the subject and is capable, luckily for us, of nothing but splendid waste.

HENRY JAMES

how charming the person, a D grade is still a D—nor can the student find the articulated legal status of civil society in a College community. Small wonder, then, that the student's individual and collective groping for a sense of recognition is as full of confusions and alarms, overlaps and cuts, as the surrealistic film. Sometimes it may end in a flamboyant or muttering gesture of self-denial like the dissolution of student government or the simpler forms of boredom and apathy that effectively deny one's personality to the enterprise of learning.

It would seem to anyone who reads the Middlebury Campus that this has been a very trying year in the area of student life. Someone stole the Dean's files, numerous pranks were committed during the fall, students grumbled about the sport season (one girl ran for office on a ticket of "athletic scholarships"), drugs were a topic of furtive interest, the administration was accused of the full range of totalitarian sins by the student editor, certain faculty were consigned to the Mesozoic age by the Student Educational Policy Committee, a small scale sit-in occurred for longer library hours, intemperate, sarcastic and scornful prose abounded in the newspaper on all subjects from the fraternities to the choir. It is easy enough to point out that the picture is distorted. Over six hundred students were involved in service projects under the sponsorship of the County Mental Health Service, the Brandon Training School, Mortar Board, various Church organizations. Students were allowed to self-chaperone fraternity parties, sophomore driving was approved, and senior women operated without a fixed curfew. Although student pranks hit a new high in number and destructiveness for a brief period, the general behaviour on campus was excellent—only one student was asked to leave during the year for improper conduct. Yet simply to balance the credits and debits of student behaviour for the year would not be an adequate response to the intense interest in the quality of student life that has been generated not only at Middlebury but in all colleges across the country. Hardly a week goes by without an article in some major magazine on the "new breed" of students. "Student watching" has become an absorbing occupation of the general public as well as supposed experts like deans and psychologists.

At the risk of generalizing so broadly that the claim becomes empty, let me try to indicate a fundamental motif that runs through the varieties of student behaviour from the dissolution of student government to social service, from sports to "pot." Larry Raab, who wrote the screenplay for "The Distances" is also an exceptionally talented poet and painter as well as the editor of the College literary magazine, Frontiers, (Middlebury's most distinguished publication of the year by a good Vermont country mile). The most recent issue included a short story of Raab's entitled, "Championship." It is a five page sketch which tells of four boys who plan a baseball game for a Saturday morning that doesn't come off. The central character, Johnny, is bitterly disappointed when he arrives at the school yard to find that the game is not to take place and he rides his bike home in despair. Why be so cut-up about a casual game that fails to material-

(student) LIFE AS (a liberal) ART

By Dr. Dennis O'Brien
Dean of the College

For Middlebury students, the audience was rather more ragged, unshod and unbarbered than the norm. A College drop-out of a year ago who had just come non-stop from San Francisco on a motorcycle was in the row directly ahead. A Tibetan talisman hung down over his faded blue work shirt. I don't know how President Armstrong felt, but I had the vague feeling that our presence as representatives of the "authority structure" was accepted with misgivings combined with a genuine desire that we be there to see what was about to be shown. The occasion was the showing of a film written and produced by three talented Middlebury students in connection with an Independent Study Project. The credits read: Lawrence Raab ('68) screen play, Peter O'Neill ('67) photography, John Plant ('67) music. The film, entitled, "The Distances," suggested that my feeling about the mood of the audience was not entirely wrong.

Beautifully photographed in low-key black and white, the film set forth a dream-like series of images involving a young man (Bruce Johnson, '67), a young girl (Mari Ward, '67), an elderly man, woods, fields, an old house and a flowing stream. Stop motion, slow motion, complex montage and abrupt cutting gave a surrealistic aura to a simple progression: a young man alone in woods, he confronts a girl on the path, she runs away, an elderly man carrying packages comes down and takes a package, the young man goes inside a strange house, he meets the girl again, the elderly man reappears, the boy unwraps the package in which he finds a knife, he threatens the old man but ends by plunging the knife into himself. Actually the screen play was more complex with parallel action taking place at different places and repeating itself so that the audience could not tell, if it was meant to, which scene was reality and which a dream. But there was only one denouement, the silent confrontation between the elderly man grown suddenly strong and ominous after his earlier frailty when attacked, the young man with upraised knife and the woman looking on with cool dispassion. It ended, in slow motion, with self destruction.

When asked to comment on student life at Middlebury during the last academic year, I find this film an interesting symbolic statement of our temporary and perennial problems. No doubt what suggested the comparison between student life and student art was the great attention paid during this year to the self-dissolution of the student government about which News Letter readers were informed in the last issue. In many ways, the College must seem the house of the stranger to our young men and women. It is surely not home where the delicate balance of family life defines what is to be done and how each person is to be counted in the whole. Nor is College civil society with its elaborate mechanisms of law and rights, courts and legislature. College is a new place, where life is governed largely by the elders—professors, administrators—who are related to the young person neither by ties of family affection nor the clarity of law. The student seeks recognition and status in this new house to which he has come. The size and function of the College preclude a total personal evaluation—no matter which goes beyond the socially viable roles for the rebel in our culture. Marijuana may be more than a gesture of protest, it may be the harbinger of final social drop-out. As in the film, it can be the rebellious gesture against authority which ends in the destruction of the one who rebels and the dissolution of the bond between the social governors and the young.

If I am at all correct in seeing an underlying need to lead a dramatic existence which expresses itself in the risks of sports, pranks and drugs, then it poses particular problems for an educational community like a College. If the truth be told, College is more like life than art. The College experience has much confusion, boring hard work and tracks that seem to promise something but never arrive. A student's confrontation with professors or deans may fit Raab's lines in a poem "Pleasures of the Insane":

> Try to forget also the keeper of the lists
> And promises, tapping on his tongue.
> He has my name misspelled and can say only:
> Who told you there was sense in that?

Where is the dramatic commitment of the whole personality in the academic life of the College? The student may drift through his studies because he cannot perceive the aesthetic unity in a Philosophy course that he can see in an exciting soccer match or a big weekend. There is, of course, a certain amount that can be done to make courses and curriculum more "exciting" and "meaningful" but in the long run the College cannot sacrifice life and truth to dramatic necessities. Students must, in part, be weaned away from the desire to shape their existence simply on dramatic models. Hannah Arendt's book on Adolph Eichmann makes a profound point when it points to "the banality of evil." It would be dramatically nice if the troubles of the world could be laid at the feet of Satanic adversaries against whom we could wage mythic battle, but, in fact, the improvement of the world depends on careful attention to intricate facts and a certain moral patience to persevere through banality and boredom. Not all rewards are dramatic awards but it takes a firm grip on the value of truth as it is, no matter how tedious, and the what is to be done, no matter how difficult or far off from achievement.

The title of this article should now become clear, I think of student life as a liberal art, not a dramatic art. The liberal arts should be based on things as they really are and the governance of student life should be based on the truth as we know it not on dramatic necessities. There is no doubt that the dramatic quality of life on the Middlebury campus would rise if complete freedom were allowed men and women to visit in the dormitories at all hours or to take off-campus apartments. But what little we do know about adolescent psychology seems to indicate that such total lack of restraint is potentially damaging to many young people. For those who thirst for drama, such dull constraints are irksome, but they are based on certain truths about human behaviour that should be the guides to student life under the liberal arts. The conflict between the student's desire for drama and the College's allegiance to truth is not fatal. Students will accept restraint if the truth is spoken straight. It is of utmost importance, however, for the College to exercise every effort to seek out and find the truth about student life since administrators and professors are as prone to their dramatic myths about students as students are about them.

We would all like to know whether there is a final opposition between life and art, between truth and drama. The students have a moral justification for demanding that life not be a colossal bore or a matter of "quiet desperation." Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the College's job is to show young people that the drama in which they must play is much more complicated than the melodramatic plot they had immediately perceived. Truth, too, has its own drama and provides the framework of ultimate risks but we probably do too little to convey this sense.

"The Distances" between man and man, authorities and students, can be very great but I am not yet ready to accept the denouement of the film that we must end with stark confrontation that leads to destruction of either the old or the young. Although it makes possible drama it makes impossible education.

ize? What legitimacy is there in the writer choosing such a subject?

What Raab has sketched out in this story is every man's simple desire to be something more than himself. It is difficult and painful to exist simply as this individual, Johnny Jones, so we seek to enlarge our personality, to give it a meaning and destiny by taking on a role in some larger drama. Consider the athlete. He clearly takes on a role, he may even adopt some costume to mark his special status, and he seeks to participate in a measured experience which has the classic dramatic form of beginning, middle and end. Instead of the aimless boredom of everyday, existence becomes focussed into the dramatic need of win or loss and the person of the athlete expands to fill the role of halfback, forward, goalie or pitcher. The dynamics of such a process are not far removed from the student "beatnik." He also finds his private personality less than satisfactory. He adopts a uniform—faded blue jeans, long hair, a Tibetan talisman—which marks him clearly as someone larger than just Johnny Jones. He seeks a dramatic form of existence in which he lives in costume, his room should look like a stage set, his actions have the exaggerated overtones of the actor, he must run risks with marijuana, the law, sex, in order to give his life a plot. When the game fails to come off, when the dramatic role is denied, the individual is thrown back in despair. In Raab's story this point is beautifully handled. Johnny arrives at the school yard where the game is supposed to come off and confronts Mike. Mike is the role player in the story: "Mike was taller and older than the others, for he had stayed back a couple of times. They say he swore at the teachers and all sorts of things. Mike liked to brag. Nobody really believed him, but they all said they did since he was bigger." Mike plays at being the tough hero and although the boys think there is something phony in this they exercise a "willing suspension of disbelief." At the point when Johnny's expectation of drama collapses, he confronts Mike the player of roles and denounces him, "Shut up! Shut up! Shut up! And stop your damn swearing all the time! You don't impress me, so just shut up! You don't impress me at all. Or anybody. Stupid idiot." With the failure of the game and a possible role in it, Johnny denounces roles and returns to the despair of life.

Raab's poetry returns continually to the theme of the plot that fizzled, the game that didn't come off, the life that should have an aim but doesn't. "Whoever built these tracks left something out, now/too late to find," he writes in a poem entitled "Railroad Tracks Come with Promises." Like lots of promises, they don't come to anything. Henry James was correct when he noted that life has no direct sense of the subject and is capable only of splendid waste, this is why we prefer art to life. Life should have drama and excitement, it should make us bigger than we are. Students may tend to overplay their roles like amateur actors—role playing and the search for drama are most acute in the young because they have not settled into a career which, hopefully, will justify and give scope to life. Then, too, lacking status and full personality integration, they are most anxious about being overwhelmed by the wasteful chanciness of life. Any role, no matter how bizarre, is a weapon against the shocks of existence.

Societies have traditionally provided certain roles for the young to play. Sports is a socially acceptable role, marijuana smoking is not. Religion has traditionally sought to strengthen the individual by giving him a role to play in a cosmic drama. If the young of today seem particularly difficult, it is because so many of the traditional roles seem to be only half-heartedly supported by the general culture. Even the traditional non-approved roles are not chosen. Society has always tolerated the young "sowing some wild oats"—some sexual adventurism for young men (but not with "proper" girls), intoxication, or mild larceny (think of all the state highway signs in fraternity houses). What disturbs so many people today is that the old socially acceptable ways of "rebelling" or "letting off steam" have been superseded by newer modes of behaviour. I believe it is proper to be concerned about these new modes of behaviour. Marijuana smoking is much less dangerous physically than alcohol, but it is more disturbing because it lacks a controlling framework of social custom. It is not the marijuana itself that is a concern, it is the choice of the individual to seek rebellion through a gesture

Injuries and inexperience were probably the two major afflictions it suffered during the 1967 season. Gone from the ranks was scoring ace and All-America Fred Beams and the graduation of Bayard Russ, one of the best goalies in college circles, left a gaping hole in the nets.

Coach Morrone groomed junior Bill McCollam, a fine Alpine skier, for the goal tender post and he responded with a good performance.

Rebuilding the midfield units was another matter and keeping healthy the few veterans in these units was more of a problem. Jim Allen, Pete Kirkpatrick, and promising sophomore Jack Kreusi, were all out of action at one point. Kreusi and Kirkpatrick returned for the last few games while Allen left college.

Following losses to Tufts, Hofstra and Adelphi on the spring trip, and a loss to Wesleyan, the Panthers defeated the University of Massachusetts, 7–5, at Porter Field. They managed a split of the next two home games, downing New Hampshire, 9–5, and losing to R. P. I., 7–14.

Middlebury lost the next three games to Amherst, Williams and Union in that order. The Panthers closed out the season on a winning note, defeating Hamilton 7–6, and Worcester Tech, 7–1.

Golf: The Panther golf team, at its zenith last year with a 9–1 mark, slipped this spring, but still managed to post a .500 record with five wins and as many losses.

Rick Smith and Freeman Allen, both lost through graduation, were sorely missed. The pair, who played the No. 2 and No. 6 spots respectively, won 16 of 20 matches during the 1966 season.

The Panther linkmen actually played much better golf than is indicated by their record. Four of their five losses proved to be extremely close, being decided late in the match by identical 4-3 scores.

Tennis: The tennis team had its problems getting started this year and then ran into some stiff opposition to wind up the campaign with a 3–6 mark. Under a new coach, R. Bruce Carroll, associate professor of Political Science, the team had some bright moments and fine personal performances, particularly by Capt. John Mallouk, the No. 1 man. The team, playing the opener in the Field House, gave a strong Wesleyan team a real battle before bowing 6–3. The Panthers dropped two more close matches to St. Lawrence and Vermont by identical 5–4 scores before recording their first win at Clarkson. Middlebury also dropped decisions to Amherst, Vermont and Dartmouth. The team wound up the regular campaign with victories over Union and R. P. I.

Track: The track team this year included some fine individual preformances, but lacked the necessary depth to give it a winning season. Wet track conditions prevented the team from getting in much of the necessary pre-season practice and also resulted in the cancellation of two early meets. Panther track men managed only one win in six dual meet starts and placed third in the Vermont State Meet. Coach Stub Mackey's boys were at a distinct disadvantage though, managing to run only one home meet on a soggy Porter Field track. Strong individual performances in the state meet, moved from Middlebury to Burlington because of wet grounds, were turned in by Art Coolidge, one of the top distance men in New England; John Morton, mile and two-mile, Glenn Curtis, half-mile; Steve Krichels, high jump and 440, and Wood, hurdles. Coolidge broke his own record for the two-mile with a time of 9:23.4.

SPORTS

MAX PETERSEN

JOSEPH J. MORRONE, JR., varsity soccer and lacrosse coach at Middlebury College, has been named assistant director of Inter-collegiate Athletics for Planning and assistant to the chairman of Physical Education for Men for Planning, President James I. Armstrong announced. The appointment becomes effective at the beginning of the 1967–68 academic year. Coach Morrone will continue to coach varsity lacrosse and soccer and freshman basketball and assist with instruction of men's physical education classes.

A native of Worcester, Mass., Mr. Morrone received a B.S. degree from the University of Massachusetts and a masters degree in education from Worcester State College. He joined the Middlebury athletic staff in 1958, after turning in an outstanding athletic career at Massachusetts.

During his coaching career at the College he has turned out several All-Americans players both in soccer and lacrosse. He was selected to coach the North squad in the annual North-South Lacrosse Game, played at the University of Massachusetts earlier this summer.

football:

MIDDLEBURY COLLEGE football fortunes in 1967 could be a little brighter than last year's 3–5 season if sophomore linemen work out as well as expected, according to Coach Duke Nelson.

Any improvement of the Panthers' record will hinge on how well Middlebury uses a good supply of line depth. The team will pick up at least two good sophomore prospects and a 6–1, 195 veteran tackle who played two years ago. They are sophomores Jan Rovelli, halfback, and Mark Yeager, fullback, and senior defenseman Jon Coffin.

The only real problem on defense is to find a replacement for 278 lb. Barnes Boffey, now with the Pittsburgh Steelers, who played middle guard so effectively.

The Panthers have a good passing quarterback in Charley Brush, '69, who passed for four touchdowns and 758 yards last season. However, Middlebury does not have an experienced man to back him up. With two good ends, Steve Callahan and Charles Beall, to throw to, Brush should again generate a good passing game.

Middlebury appears to have some good halfback and fullback prospects, but lacks the speed necessary for a strong running game.

The team should continue to get good kicking from soccer style booter, Pete Kirkpatrick. The big senior averaged 37.8 yards a kick in 68 tries last year, kicked three field goals and 10 conversions.

THE SOCCER TEAM will have a good overall balance with strong halfback strength. A major problem will be to develop a replacement for First Team All America Goalie, Chappy Garrison, plus some scoring punch.

Among the key losses by graduation this June were: Pete Kovner, fullback, team captain and an All-America player; Tom Moore, halfback, and an All—New England player; and two New England Intercollegiate Soccer League award winners—Stu Bicknell, outside left, and Nedson Dumbo, inside left.

The 1967 team will gather strength from such prospects as Capt. Dave Severance, Steve Krichels and Bruce Kimmel. Competition will be keen for the vacant goalie spot with Bob Calder, Stud Dunn, Bob Cowan and Paul Reed competing for this position. Nearly one-half of the squad (17 of 36) will consist of sophomores.

spring sports:

SPRING SPORTS events in northern climates usually fall victim to inclement weather occasionally, but not as often as during the 1967 season, marked by snow, rain and cold.

Middlebury scheduling became impossible as one event after another had to be cancelled or postponed because of wet grounds, rain, snow and sagging temperatures. Most of the teams were unable to play on home fields until the first part of May and were forced to hold limited practice sessions in the Field House.

The Panther coaching staff isn't placing all the blame for a generally disappointing spring sports season on the weather, but will admit that it was a key factor in the final outcome.

Only the golf team came close to a winning season on the varsity level, turning in a 5–5 record. The others, baseball, lacrosse, track and tennis, all posted losing campaigns. In freshman sports, the undefeated tennis team was the one bright spot while the other teams broke even or turned in losing records.

Baseball: The Panther nine appeared to have the makings of a good season with the addition of a sophomore pitcher in Jim Soja and the return of a veteran infield. However, loose fielding and poor hitting led to a winless season (0–10).

Despite the string of losses, Middlebury did have its brighter moments in at least four extra-inning games it lost by one run. An inability to come up with the clutch hit cost the Panthers these games and others.

Panther pitching by junior Steve Syriala and sophomore Jim Soja looked good despite these losses and will form the nucleus of a strong staff next year.

Its first three games rained out, the Middlebury nine finally opened the season on the road against M.I.T. with a 4–5 loss in 11 innings. Three days later in their first home game, the Panthers were clubbed 11–4 by Williams.

Close on the heels of the Williams defeat was another 11 inning loss, this time 3–4 at R.P.I. Then followed losses to Vermont, 0–7; Lowell Tech, 1–6; and two to Norwich, 4–7, and 3–7.

Middlebury came close to getting a taste of victory in a postponed home game with Clarkson before bowing 4–5 in 10 innings. The two final losses came at home by identical 0–6 scores at the hands of Dartmouth and Vermont.

Lacrosse: Although the lacrosse team was also hampered by the weather, it managed to play all of its games. After a slow start, with four straight losses, it went on to post a 4–8 mark.

Paris Fletcher was awarded an honorary Doctor of Science degree at the June 9th commencement exercises of Worcester Polytechnic Institute. Commenting on the honor bestowed upon Mr. Fletcher, the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram published the following editorial:

"Yankees have the marrow," wrote Samuel Woodworth in attempting to picture the inner strength of those early Americans who had hewn the young country from the wilderness. This might serve also as an apt description of the vice-chairman of Worcester Polytechnic Institute's Board of Trustees. A friendship as enduring, and wisdom as solid, as the granite hills of his native state of Vermont, have been characteristic of the service which Paris Fletcher has rendered to this college, and to the community.

Few men in the modern life of this city have served it and its institutions so well. Throughout his career as one of Worcester's most prominent attorneys, he has also devoted his leadership abilities to guiding the destinies of so many of the organizations and causes that work for the welfare of this city and its people, that the list defies enumeration.

Born on a college campus, education has always been among his foremost interests. In addition to his fourteen years of service as a trustee of Worcester Polytechnic Institute, nine of them as secretary of the corporation, he serves also as a trustee of his own alma mater, Middlebury College.

An astute student of the past, he is also a builder of the future. Love of his fellow man, practical foresight, penetrating understanding, never-failing humor—these are the main attributes for which he is admired. Under his sage counsel and guidance, the many foundations and trusts which he serves as trustee have contributed mightily to the growth and development of the institutions of this community. Because of this, if known to them, the generations of today
